Background Information for the New Shooter

What are sporting clays?

With its roots coming from England, sporting clays is a shotgun shooting game in which clay pigeons are presented to the gunner in ways that mirror the flight pattern of game birds, or occasionally rabbits, in their natural habitats. The shooting grounds are laid out in stations with each station representing one type of bird or a combination of game, a rabbit and a grouse for example.

At each station, clays are thrown in pairs. A course consists of several stations, usually eight to fifteen, where 100 birds or more may be presented over the course. Sometimes birds from the same traps may be shot from different positions, so the gunner sees the same target from entirely new angles, which creates entirely new shooting problems. An area presenting clays to several stations from a single trap is called a field. With variations in trap position, trap speed, shooting position and flight paths of different types of clays, targets can come through trees, from under your feet, straight down, over your head, quartering, going away, left to right, right to left in any path a real bird might choose.

What are the basic rules?

As in golf, the rules of sporting clays become more specific, and therefore more restrictive, as the level of competition increases. There are a few basic rules however, that define the sport:

The shooter may start with a low gun or a pre-mounted gun when calling for the target.

Only two shells may be loaded.

If doubles are thrown and both are broken with one shot, both are counted as kills.

Master Shooters

Each station will have a pro shooter to help instruct and keep each group safe in handling and shooting a firearm. Shotgun instructions will be provided by each pro shooter.
